

Crafting an Executive Resume That Will Get Noticed

Article | March 20, 2019

When's the last time you revamped your resume? As an executive, this is an often-ignored exercise—but it shouldn't be. Charlene Bergman explains the importance of having a polished resume and offers tips that will make yours stand out.

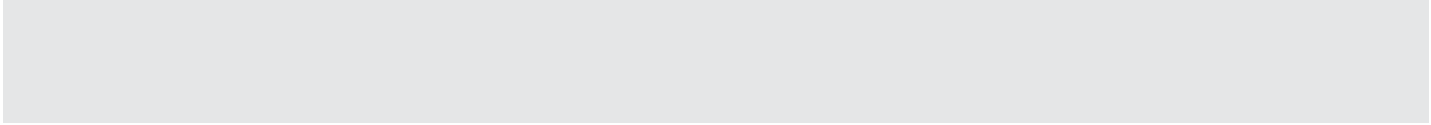

Crafting an executive resume that will get noticed

Executive recruitment has witnessed significant changes in recent decades, with heightened competition for positions, more sophisticated search processes, and faster executive turnover. For recruiters, the increased activity can limit the time available to review each candidate. All of this puts the onus on you, the executive, to state your qualifications succinctly, match your skills to the job, and at the same time distinguish yourself from competitors—not a simple task.

AUTHOR

Charlene Bergman
Managing Director &
Partner

Customize and use keywords

The position you seek is likely to have specific descriptors, which might even appear in a job posting. Use this to your advantage, mirroring the same terms to portray your qualifications. Not only will recruiters focus on these terms, but larger employers may even use applicant tracking systems that scan resumes looking specifically for these keywords.

Don't confuse keywords with buzzwords, which can be a real turnoff to reviewers. No one will be impressed that you're a proactive, results-oriented team player who thinks outside the box.

Lastly, never rely on your cover letter to customize your qualifications for the position sought. Often, the recruiter will go directly to the resume and won't read the cover letter at all.

Focus on skills and achievements, rather than on past duties and responsibilities

Employers are more interested in what you can do in the new position than in the detail of former duties. Concentrate more on talents and accomplishments than on past responsibilities. In describing your achievements, use verbs that imply action, including implemented, improved, and attained. Wherever possible, use quantifiable measures such as, "increased export sales by 65% in the 2018 fiscal year, reduced DSO by x days, increased employee engagement by x percentage YOY." Executives can have careers that span several decades. Typically, experience that goes back more than 15 years will not be relevant—especially if there has been a variety of roles during that period. Therefore, highlight your most recent experience.

Consider an executive bio for networking

Your job search should include lots of face-to-face networking opportunities such as coffees, lunches, and receptions that are outside the formal recruiting process. These provide a great opportunity to offer your contacts or new people you meet a brief synopsis of your competencies and achievements. Make sure your one-page bio includes the personal profile section of your resume, bullet points or a paragraph of your achievements, and a listing of the companies or roles you have held.

And finally, mind the details

Unfortunately, a candidate's resume can be summarily rejected, no matter how well it is written or how carefully you matched it to the role. Proofread repeatedly for typos, diction, and grammar. Preferably, have someone—possibly a professional writer or editor—review your resume for form and content. The resume is an opportunity to showcase your expertise and experiences, and mistakes won't speak well to your day-to-day attention to detail.

In most cases, your resume will be the first touch-point with a prospective employer. Taking the time and care to ensure it's captivating, succinct, and relevant will go a long way—increasing the odds of your resume standing out and landing at the top of the pile.

Recommended for you:

Effective networking doesn't happen overnight. Find out how best to network yourself. Read article